Week in Review

New federal and state laws are continuing to impact our relationship with technology and online resources. This was recently illustrated by the roll out of web-based health insurance exchanges under the federal Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act. The roll out did not go smoothly, and the news was filled with stories of technological glitches and errors that, to some extent, took center stage over the continued partisan split over the substance of the law. At the state level, California passed a law that gives people under the age of eighteen the right to have personal information, photos, and content deleted from websites. As individuals worry more about their online profile, laws like this permit minors to scrub damaging information from the web before they seek to enter the workforce. Elsewhere this week, Instagram turned three years old, and Samsung unveiled its new curved smartphone.
